Good News: These days, women are living longer and healthier lives.

Bad News: Women who live longer lives face the prospect of a lower quality of life toward the end of their lives.

Because women are traditionally the primary providers and recipients of long-term care services, longevity means that those women who remain healthy may have to sacrifice their own financial and emotional independence.

*Financial and emotional security
– by chance or by choice?*

Learning more about long-term care needs for yourself and those who depend on you allows you to evaluate the many considerations facing women today.

As a woman, one of the most important factors you will want to consider is the potential emotional and financial impact of providing and needing long-term care.

Long-term care insurance offers you choices

Maintain your independence

Today many women are turning to long-term care insurance to help prepare for their own future needs as well as the needs of their children, spouses and parents.

The benefits from long-term care insurance would allow you to receive care in a variety of settings or ease the emotional and financial burden of caregiving. It provides you with the control you want to make your own choices.

Who might you have to care for and who might be able to care for you?
